Why are job descriptions important?

Staff is the most expensive component of running a summer program and arguably the most critical to student experience. From central office to site-level and classroom staff, the process of staffing the summer program can add role clarity from the beginning if done in a coordinated way. RAND recommends that districts: hire engaged and dedicated site leaders with strong organizational and interpersonal skills; hire motivated academic teachers with grade-level content knowledge; and ensure enrichment instructors have relevant content knowledge. Detailed, tailored job descriptions increase the odds that program leaders will recruit and hire qualified staff.

Who can benefit from these resources?

- District central office managers
- School-based program leaders
- Nonprofit program leaders

Tips for developing effective job descriptions

As you draft position descriptions, identify core competencies of staff. For example, RAND researchers found that site management directly influences the daily experiences and learning of students through logistics, scheduling, climate, behavior management, and expectations. They recommend that site managers periodically observe instruction to understand which teachers may need additional support and enrichment and provide the district feedback on instructors and community based organizations. Include such relevant qualifications and roles and responsibilities in position postings, along with information on compensation, program schedule, and hiring timeline. Additional tips include:

- Begin assessing your staffing needs and developing position descriptions in the fall.
- Develop a process and timeline for hiring, focusing on central office and site leaders in the winter and teachers and other essential staff in the spring. Include in your plan a process for posting and sharing jobs throughout the district.
